

LATIN AMERICAN SOCIETY hablan . . .

Dr. F. Crowley, head of the Latin American Studies Department.

Aside from sponsoring projects at the College, the Society had members traveling south of the border this past summer, as it has in previous years. Two of our '67 graduates spent study sessions in Mexico while one of this year's grads, Kevin MacNamara, worked for two months in the rural areas of Puerto Rico. In the area of academics, our moderator and head of the Latin American Studies Department, Dr. Crowley, was instrumental in bringing about changes in the curriculum requirements of the Department which, it is hoped, will lure more candidates to declare as Latin American Studies majors. Chief among these changes was the dropping of the summer abroad requirement which had proved to be an economic barrier to many prospective majors. Next year, an increase in the ranks of the Department is expected as more and more students are made aware of the different areas towards which a Latin America degree can be applied such as sociology, language, history, international business, government service and the like.

Some of the members: Agustin Mas, Fabian De Jesus, Robert Conway, Kevin MacNamara, Paul Valenti; center: Sister Cecily Collins.

Kevin hard at work in the hills of Puerto Rico.

The chapel at Ortega, P.R. begins to unfold.

