

Ed Fox, Editor-in-chief, was the first Junior elected to the post in eight years.

Voice Bounces Back

Hampered by student apathy, lack of confidence expressed in a limited budget, inadequate office space, minimal co-operation from all sectors, dearth of such basics as usable typewriters or cameras, the upheaval of the move to Remsen Street and faced with the task of creating a student newspaper out of the shambles left by his predecessors, Ed Fox accomplished minor miracles.

Criticism of Editor Fox's bi-weekly productions was rampant. Some issues had a ratio of one column inch of news to every three inches of ads and filler. Some of the features were glutted with high school humor. News was sometimes passed up because of space limitations. Editorializing seemed to be de rigeur in many issues. Lo and behold! There were even errors in grammar and spelling.

But one fact stood up despite the outcries. For the first time in at least two years, St. Francis College had a regularly published student paper. Credit goes to an editor who was the first junior in eight years to be given the post.
