Salvatore Allocco, Editor-in-Chief, attended the Catholic University Journalism Institute. He taught what he had learned about layout and editing to his hand-picked staff, who in turn imparted their knowledge to new members.

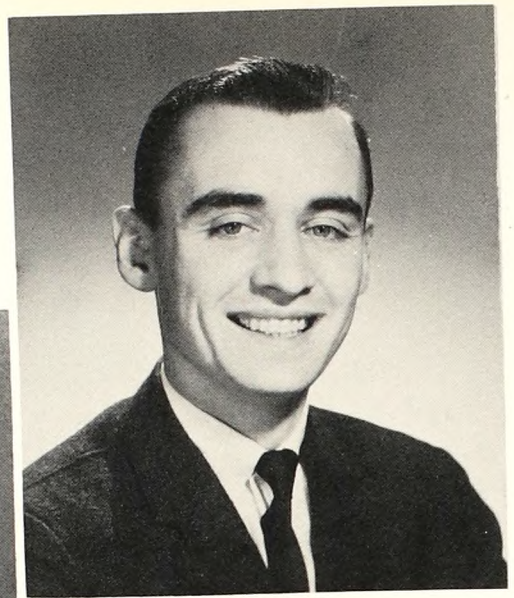

"To be proofread," comments Mike Henning. As a writer on the sports staff, John Ward wrote mainly athletic feature articles, as well as straight feature stories.

Joe Murphy proved to be an invaluable editorial consultant as well as an all-around staff member for the paper.

As News Editor, John A. Ferguson worked with his staff on the basic tenets of news writing. He wrote headlines for the news pages and marked copy for printing, as well as writing various stories.

William Walsh rose to the News Editorship from positions as typist and Student Council reporter. He prepared page assignments, proof-read news copy and wrote headlines for the news pages.

The Voice is the student newspaper which enables its staff to develop journalistic skills through actual practice. The aim of the paper is to present news, feature articles, athletic stories and editorials to keep the student body informed concerning academic and extracurricular developments.

Members of the staff are taught the rudiments of layout, news writing, page makeup and dummyping, as well as proof-reading and feature writing. Students are free to express their opinions on any topic in a Letters to the Editor section on the feature page.
