Flying Course Initiated

Brother Michael in flight with student pilot.

PERHAPS the most interesting of new activities at the college this year was the flying course. After preliminary ground school lectures, students put theory into practice with six actual flights out of the Staten Island Airport. On completion of this "Introduction to Flight" fledglings could start, taxi, take-off, climb, glide, dive, turn, and make landing approaches with the aircraft. Brother Michael, an ex-Naval aviator left over from World War II, handled the instruction.
