

"What do you mean, Plato couldn't write Greek!" Ed McDonald states in sharp retort.

Under the active leadership of its moderator, Professor Farley and its president, Bob Di Giovanni, the Philosophy Club began a series of lectures this year which have proven highly successful. These lectures and a series of stimulating discussions and films have provided philosophy majors and those others interested with an even broader base in this area of study.

Among the lecturers heard this year were Mr. Willard Hutchins of the Philosophy Department of the City University, Mr. Thomas Kelleher, formerly of the faculty of Notre Dame University and Rev. Robert Kennedy.

Mike Galli sits and contemplates.

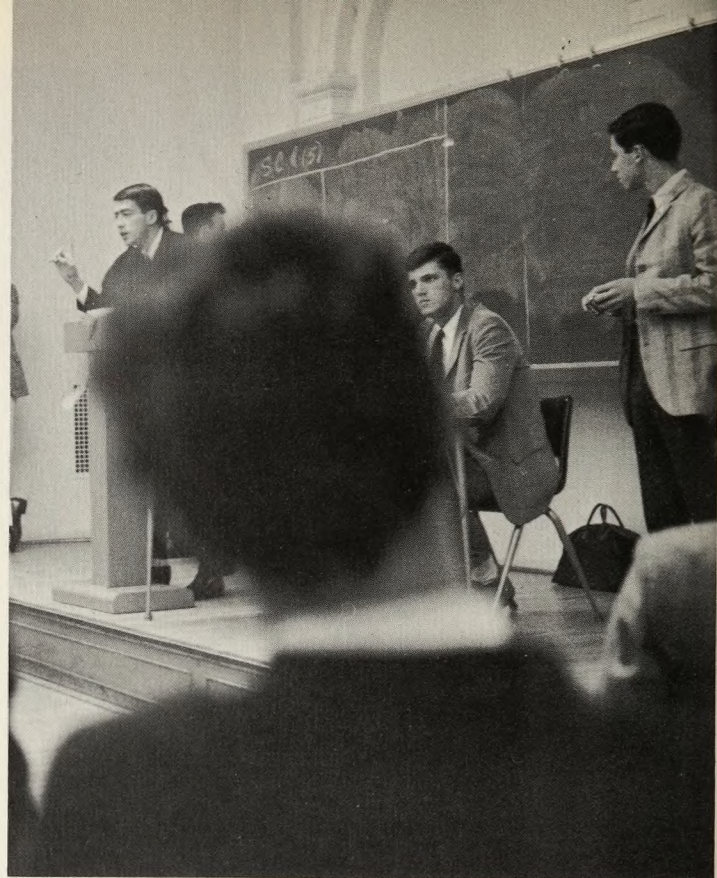

Inexperience and a misguided overzealousness were the highlights of this year's Student Council. With President Bob Long at the helm and John Perry as the only shadow of political experience, the Council attempted to reach a state of effectiveness so far never actually realized.

Its initial plan of action was to destroy the "cliques" so evident during the past four years. The desired outcome was aborted by a grossly inept attack against elements of the Council who were supposedly members of the so called "clique." Political hostilities obviously erupted yet they were somewhat softened by a smattering of constructiveness. Progress was the order of the day on such matters as, Who's Who Awards, and the John F. Kennedy Carnival Committee.

While on the hand the usual political machinations corrupted most of the semblance of maturity and political insight. It was evident this year that the Council needed a leadership that was both knowledgeable and versed in the art of Parliamentary Procedure.

The Council tried . . . but failed; yet it was a beginning in bridging the ocean between failure and success.

The Council's elections committee handles all of the student elections in the College.

Vice-President Perry heads home after a long night.
